It was a trip I'll never forget. It happened in 2004, when my parents decided to go on a trip and they took me with them. It may sound bizarre, but at that time I didn't really like my father very much. He was a busy man, who visited me on weekends only and I had never had a chance to know him better. His attitude didn't help either: he was grumpy, serious and wasn't keen on showing affection. As expected, such behaviour wasn't something a 5-year-old me would expect from a parent and that made me dislike my father quite a lot.

"He doesn't love me!" - I told my mother once.

"It isn't true, sweetie," - she said with a smile and went on with the chores. She was a calm and gentle woman and I'd always wondered how she could be so patient with her husband. Now I understand that I may have been too harsh on my father. He wasn't mean, he wasn't ignorant or violent, but he definitely wasn't fun to be around at all, so I thought about the trip as something challenging.

In the end, the trip itself was very fun. We went to the mountains and the nature was spectacular: the trees, the sky and the nearby river were very beautiful that day. We spent about 4 hours climbing the mountains and my mother was the one who made it fun: she was telling jokes and stories, mostly about the explorers that climbed mount Everest or other mountain ranges. My father, on the other hand, was quiet, but I could hear him chuckle once, which made me very surprised if not confused.

When we were heading back home, we decided to take a break at the riverside. I still can remember that ^{moment} as it was yesterday. After some time we started talking and my father gave me something in a colorful box.

"What is this?" - I asked.

"A present," - he said.

I took the box and ~~saw~~ ^{to see} what was inside: it was a toy. A beautiful white horse, that I had always wanted, but couldn't find. Then my father began telling us how he tried to find the toy and he was ~~so~~ seemed genuinely happy, because he could see that he made his daughter
