(title) The attendance of national museums and how to improve it

England is one of the most popular destinations for tourists from all countries. Its world-famous museums are visited by millions of foreigners each year and their amount changes annually.

The data is showing that national museums and galleries in England remain popular throughout the years as they are visited by more than a million tourists each year. However, the popularity of some museums is increasing rapidly while the rate of places becomes less and less respectable. The attendance of the British Museum, for example, has grown respectively. In 2013 only 2.6 million people visited it while in 2017 this number has increased up to 5.6 million. Some museums' popularity, unfortunately, declines. Natural History Museum and the Science Museum now have less than two million visitors a year but in 2013 almost 4 million people came to visit each of these places.

There are substantial things that can be done to increase people's attendance. Firstly, I would recommend the museums to organise more temporary exhibitions. Many tourists will desire to visit them until they will finish and the galleries will become more popular. Secondly, it would be necessary to organise special interactive exhibitions for children as many people travel with families and it will help to attract visitors of all ages.

All things considered, attendance of most national museums and galleries is increasing but there still things to be improved. The appeal of having unique exhibitions can attract more people and draw on the popularity of the sights.
