56. I have been studying in this school for eight years already, and it's not hard for me to remember our school's museum's glory days. Our students were wandering through the rooms, enchanted by the unique atmosphere there. Even tourists from abroad pay here paying us a visit from time to time. And what do it see now?

50. Glass showcases, covered with dust. As the interest for our museum had started to rapidly decrease, other rooms were turned into storage rooms. Can we really call this a museum?

The objects are clumped together, because of the space limitations. The information about all presented objects is shown as a big passages of incomprehensible words. No one reads them, and that limits the visitors' engagement with what we have presented.

First of all, we need some space to breathe. We need to transform the storage rooms back into the museum ones. Also, I propose an idea of making a more innovative museum. To enhance the visitors' experience, we could set up digital tablets, and maybe have install quizzes on them related to the objects on the display. We could also receive some feedback and outputs from those who might have taken the quiz.

To sum up everything written above, I think that our museum could easily become the whole town's attraction, if we put a little bit more thought into it.
